Preface

This reader presents contributions that help theorize comparative public law. Its main aim is to advance the transnational field of comparative public law by reflecting on its rationales, methods, and practices. Focusing on comparative public law is to showcase its specificities. We do not deny the many commonalities with private comparative law nor the general field of comparative law tout court.

When selecting among the many possible contributions, nationality was a key criterion. Indeed, presenting contributions from Germany is this reader's second aim. Comparative public law scholarship (as public international law or European public law) continues to be influenced by national traditions and contexts. Reflecting those traditions and contexts, disputed as they are, helps building a transnational, but rooted field of comparative public law. Such rootedness is valuable in a world that celebrates diversity and self-determination.

The contributions come in three groups according to their main theoretical thrust. Those of the first group mainly reflect rationales of comparative public law, while the second are more reflective of methods and the third theorizes specific practices. Of course, the lines between rationales, methods and practices are rather blurred and many contributions traverse through these categories. Therefore, the presentation under the broad categories of 'rationales', 'methods' and 'practices' is not meant to pigeonhole them into sealed compartments. So the texts could be classified differently. Indeed, academic work, including editorial work, is always a reflection of the situatedness of the scholar, an insight best proven by reflecting on comparative public law.
